former give muscular vigor and power, the latter wombs: 'amâmeh 'aṣabe w-ḫwâleh arḥâm. 602 827

Among those connected by blood relationship, eben al-'amm, it is prohibited to bind a captured thief, mâ 'alejh arrbâṭ, or to attack after midnight or shortly before sunrise, which is the most favorable time for resting: mamnû' 'alejhom al-bejât w-aṣ-ṣbâḥ. The blood price is fixed at fifty camels, a mare, and armed equipment. 602

The blood relationship, beni al-'amm, at the wish of the chiefs is sometimes granted to clans who are not related by blood and who derive their origin from quite different ancestors. If the chiefs of two unrelated tribes, barrâni (or aǧnabi), are favorably disposed towards each other, they proclaim that they will bestow the right of kinship upon each other, ḥakk al-beni'am (or ḥakk al-beni'ame [sic]), as follows: "Between us and you there shall continue the friendship of kinsmen as between kinsmen related by blood: bênana w-bênakom ṣadâḳat al-beni'ame ṣwât al-beni'am." As such it is their duty to protect each other's neighbor, ḳaṣir, guest, ṣeji, or fellow traveler, ḫawi, even though he should be their actual enemy. It is likewise their duty to acquaint each other with the movements of hostile troops. In reality such a friendship has no value if the chiefs do not pay heed to it. "It is fairly spoken but it brings no profit, teṣlîḥ al-ḥači min ṣejr manfa'a." If a member of one of these tribes kills a man of the other tribe, he does not pay the blood price amounting to fifty camels, such as is the custom with actual beni 'ammeh, but only seven, as in the case of unrelated tribes, aǧnâb. If a thief from such a tribe is caught, he may be fettered: moreover, such a tribe may also be attacked after midnight, which is not permissible with the actual beni al-'amm. 608 628

Âl and Ahl

According to the Rwala, their tribe is known as ḳabîlet (or bedidet, or 'aširt) aṣ-ṣwala, 'ašire having the same meaning as bedide or ḳabîle. The clan and sometimes the kin are denoted by the word âl, which is often interchanged with the article al, although the meaning of the former is known to every Rwejli. Generally the word âl denotes the same as beni or eben, its meaning being larger than that of ahl. Ferîž is the 101 601 counted himself five times removed from his second cousin, Neǧîb. The older a man grows, the more extended is the circle of his relatives, provided, of course, that he begets sons, for his ahl then comprises not only his father and grandfather, if living, and his collaterals, but also his sons and grandsons.

The ahl of a Rwejli protects him from injustice and suffers for his guilt. The representative of this blood relationship is likewise known as ahl. This representative, that is, the ahl in the narrower sense of the word, is usually either the father, the uncle, or the elder brother. Sa'ûd, the son of Prince an-Nûri, had a tent of his own; if he said: "I shall go to my ahl," he never went into his own tent but into that of his father, Prince an-Nûri. If the latter was not present, he hastened to his older brother, Nawwâf. A solemn proclamation that somebody has been received into such and such an ahl may take the place of blood relationship.

The ahl al-bejt denotes the wife of a tent-owner or the wife of his brother, the whole tent being under her control. The phrase ahl al-bejt is interchangeable with râ'ijet al-bejt, the mistress of the tent. A guest calls for ahl al-bejt if he wishes to have a covering for his bed. The Bedouin living in a tent of his own calls his wife ahl al-bejt, ahl bejti, or râ'ijet bejti. If he has children they also belong to the ahl al-bejt. The wife never calls her husband ahl al-bejt or ahl bejti, but râ'i-l-bejt or râ'i bejtena, lord of the tent, lord of our tent. If she has a little boy, she refers to her husband as abu flân, the father of So and So. As long as the Rwejli lives in his father's tent it is impossible to speak of his ahl al-bejt, even though he is married and has children. He and his family belong to the family, ahl, of his father. If the father dies and his married sons still remain with their families in his tent, it is known as the tent of the sons of So and So, bejt 'ejâl flân, or the tent of their mother, if she is alive. The ahl al-bejt of such a tent is either the old mother or the wife of one of the brothers who has charge of the tent. If the wife of the oldest brother cannot agree with the wives of the remaining brothers, her husband says to her: "Thou shalt stay in this corner and from today onwards the ahl al-bejt (râ'ijet al-bejt) will be So and So." Among the Rwala the ahl al-bejt is the same as the 'ajle of the other tribes.

In its broader significance ahl denotes distinct tribes that are generally united for their mutual protection. Thus it is
